Weather - JUNE 2007

The dominant features of this year's June weather have been East Coast Lows, a three-day belt of rain from a northwest cloudband and a taste of winter in the Hinterland that made the record books. In the first week of the month a low developed off Fraser Island with a potential to become a phenomena sometimes referred to as an East Coast Bomb. We were extremely lucky on this occasion as the episode remained a rain depression and was not accompanied by strong winds as experienced later in the week when the same low was off the mid-NSW coast, bringing structural damage and extensive floods. There was an extensive high pressure system covering the whole continent, an upper level low in a north-west jet stream and finally a low pressure cell off Fraser Island. The outcome of all this was to bring us a real taste of winter, especially on Wednesday 20th when the mercury plummeted overnight to 3°C, with a Wind Chill Factor of 1.7°C. As the day progressed the temperature failed to rise higher than 10°C, and was the lowest maximum temperature officially recorded in Maleny.
